IT worker imparts lessons in Turkish

She learned the language while studying in Turkey and is now helping other students to bridge the language gap, while also guiding them on getting admission in the country

Sakshi Kharakar
@akshayrjoshi
TWEETS @Sakshiakash, Mirror

In an attempt to bridge the language gap for those interested in pursuing education in Turkey, Tanzila Kadir Khan, a 25-year-old IT professional, has started conducting language classes for students from the city's 100+ institutions of higher learning, a mix of Indian students who studied in Turkey, and also students of overseas. Khan is interacting brightly with students on the critical topics of grammar, syntax and sentence structure.

Khan has been training students of Shikshan Hakka Development Research and Promotion Manch in Poona on how to learn the language. She has also organized a series of free English classes for students from the Muslim community and from an economically weak background, as learning the language can be a tough competition for government college seats. On the other hand, many foreign students have opportunities in Turkey for professional courses. Our institute trains students and guides them for various entrance examinations and we have now also started to introduce them to the avenues available in various other countries. As a part of this, we are training them in Turkish to help them take opportunities in the country.

Khan also explained that there are scholarships and through believe in social work, can working in any company get a single off day. I like to spend those evenings teaching students Turkish. I wish that I can introduce the language to many more and educate them on the various opportunities.

A Class XII student from Abela Inter-dan College, Almera Warare, said, "I aspire to make a name in the field of medicine but the competition is high for medical colleges abroad."
